

Être vs Avoir vs Faire pour la température

Kunal Khurana

2025-02-22

Link copied!

When learning French, one of the trickiest aspects is understanding which auxiliary verb to use in different contexts. This is especially true when talking about temperature, whether it's about how you feel, the weather, or the state of an object. Let's break it down with examples to make it easier.

1. Using “Avoir” for Personal Sensations (Body Temperature)

In French, when you want to express how you feel in terms of temperature, you use the verb “avoir” (to have). This is because you're describing a personal sensation, not the external environment.

J'ai chaud. → I feel hot.

J'ai froid. → I feel cold.

For example:

J'ai chaud aujourd'hui, je vais boire de l'eau. (I feel hot today, I'm going to drink some water.)

J'ai froid, je vais mettre un manteau. (I feel cold, I'm going to put on a coat.)

2. Using “Faire” for the Weather

When talking about the weather in general, French uses the verb “faire” (to make/do). This is because you're describing the external environment, not a personal feeling.

Il fait chaud. → It's hot (outside).

Il fait froid. → It's cold (outside).

For example:

Il fait chaud aujourd'hui, je vais à la plage. (It's hot today, I'm going to the beach.)

Il fait froid ce matin, je porte un pull. (It's cold this morning, I'm wearing a sweater.)

3. Using “Être” for Objects

When describing the temperature of an object, you use the verb “être” (to be). This is because you’re talking about the state of the object itself.

Le thé est chaud. → The tea is hot.

Le thé est tiède. → The tea is warm.

Le thé est froid. → The tea is cold.

For example:

Le café est trop chaud, je vais attendre. (The coffee is too hot, I’ll wait.)

L’eau est froide, je ne vais pas nager. (The water is cold, I’m not going to swim.)

Practice Sentences

Let’s put it all together with some simple sentences:

J’ai chaud, mais il fait froid dehors. → I feel hot, but it’s cold outside.

Le lait est tiède, pas chaud. → The milk is warm, not hot.

Il fait beau aujourd’hui, mais j’ai froid. → It’s nice today, but I feel cold.

La soupe est trop chaude, attends un peu. → The soup is too hot, wait a bit.

En hiver, il fait froid et j'ai toujours froid. → In winter, it's cold outside, and I always feel cold.

Key Takeaway

Avoir → For personal sensations (how you feel).

Faire → For the weather (external temperature).

Être → For objects (their state or temperature).

For details, please refer to this pdf.